PART C: A LIST OF TERMS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE CHARACTERIZING PERSONAL BEHAVIOR AND PERSONALITY 38

PREFACE

Sooner or later every psychologist working in the field of personality collides with the problem of trait-names. Whatever method he employs,—rating scales, tests, factor-analysis, clinical interviews or any other technique,—he is forced to ask himself whether the terms he is using in describing qualities and attributes of personality do actually denote psychic dispositions or traits, or whether these terms are mischievous verbal snares tempting him into the pitfalls of hypostatization and other perils of "verbal magic." It is small comfort to him to realize that the problem is an ancient one, disputed long ago by the Nominalist and the Realist, and up to the present time remaining a persistent and unsolved problem.

It would seem foolhardy to attempt an answer to the riddle of names, including that most difficult question concerning the correspondence between symbols and the phenomena that lie "in the depths of nature." Yet the psychologist dealing with personality must have some guidance. The nature of his work forces him to seek out and to identify dynamic mental structures and sub-structures (habits, needs, sentiments, attitudes, or traits) and to name them. Mathematical symbols cannot be used, for they are utterly foreign to the vital functions with which the psychologist is dealing. Only verbal symbols (ambiguous and troublesome as they are) seem appropriate.

Much research in the past has suffered from the haphazard use of trait-names. Often terms emotionally toned have been employed instead of those that are affectively neutral and more appropriate for science. And some investigators have been so naïve as to assign an arbitrary name to a hypothetical disposition and then to turn about and "explain" conduct with the magical aid of the name. Others have committed the opposite fallacy, assuming because names may be used ill-advisedly that therefore symbols never correspond to psychic structures; in a burst of skepticism they sometimes even conclude that there are no psychic structures of any sort. Every alleged structure is a "fiction." What is clearly needed is a logic for naming traits that will engender caution and yet will not paralyze psychological investigators with metaphysical misgivings.

The guiding theory advanced in this monograph is based upon inductive considerations drawn from the appended tabulation of all the trait-names in the English language,—all at least that are included in Webster's unabridged New International Dictionary. At various times in the past other students of personality have felt the need for such a lexicon of trait-names, and have undertaken the labor of preparing lists, but for one reason or another all these attempts were unfinished.

Although the chief purpose in preparing the present list is theoretical, the classification has several practical uses as well:

(1) Taken as a whole the list is a thesaurus of 17,953 terms, a treasury not only of symbols but also of problems for the psychologist as well. Each single term specifies in some way a form of human behavior; each term is a record of commonsense observation, inexact perhaps, but nevertheless constituting an authentic problem for the science that has taken as its task the purification and codification of commonsense views of human nature. No easy fly-by-night conception of human personality will satisfy the psychologist who keeps the list at hand. It suggests enough problems to keep him at work for a life-time.

(2) Psychologists often need to construct schedules of one sort or another for the systematic investigation of personality. Check-lists, rating scales, psychographs, guides for interviews, guides for self-study, terms to be used in studies of synonyms or in the construction of questionnaires,—many such selected lists can be drawn from our tabulation. For the first time the investigator who constructs such special lists may be certain that he can make it as complete as he wishes without having to comb for himself the entire lexicon of the language. In this monograph he will find the preliminary sifting done for him.

(3) The division of the terms into four parallel columns should greatly enhance the usefulness of the list. The primary purpose in distinguishing sub-classes was to determine whether it might be possible to separate neutral words (Column I) from censorial and evaluative terms (Column III). The distinction, we believe, turned out to be not only possible but significant as well. As is always the case in linguistic matters, it is possible to argue indefinitely concerning the "meaning" of any single term, but if the list is taken as a whole, there will be little question in the reader's mind that the contrasting trends of Column I and of Column III represent an important distinction.

Since Column III contains evaluative (characterial) terms it should be avoided by psychologists unless they are prepared to deal with the subject of social judgment, i.e., of eulogistic and dyslogistic symbols. This column, of course, may be directly serviceable to the educator or moralist whose interest is primarily in ethical codes or normative judgments, or to the social psychologist who wishes a vocabulary of terms signifying the subjective impressions which one individual may make upon another.

Column I, on the other hand, contains those terms that have the most imperative claim upon investigators who have a "realistic" or "personalistic" view of traits, as well as upon all other psychologists who seek a relatively unweighted vocabulary. Even those psychologists who do not believe that names ever correspond closely to psychological "realities" will find in Column I the most "objective" and therefore the most serviceable terms for the preparation of charts for use in counseling, self-study, vocational guidance, or other common psychological practices.

Column II contains terms designating mood, emotional activity, or casual and temporary forms of conduct, such as are not ordinarily considered permanent or consistent dispositions, and yet at the same time serve to differentiate one man's conduct from another's. In the strict sense of the words, these terms do not symbolize personality at all, for personality always seems to imply some form of lasting mental structure. But the line is difficult to draw, and so for the sake of completeness, these words descriptive of present activity or mood are included. This column should be of special interest to psychologists working in the fields of affection, action, and will. If the first column expresses authentic personal dispositions, the second may then be said to include forms of specific but variable behavior resulting from these dispositions as modified by the effective stimuli of the moment.

The fourth column contains miscellaneous terms, many of them metaphorical or of doubtful applicability to human personality. It contains innumerable suggestions for students of linguistics and rhetoric, and at the same time is not without its value to psychologists. In it are many terms signifying genetic conditions under which personality develops, also terms applying to physique, endowment, and other capacities closely associated with personality.

In the strictest sense of the word only Column I contains trait-names. But in our present stage of progress not all psychologists are willing to confine themselves to "the strictest sense of the word," or to embrace the special theory of traits outlined briefly in the monograph. For this reason it has seemed best to use the designation "trait-names" somewhat loosely for all four columns. The usefulness of our classification, we feel, is not in the slightest degree dependent upon the acceptance of any particular theory of the nature of human traits. The data are all spread before the reader. If from them he can find support for newer and better theories of personality he is welcome to do so.

PART A: THE PROBLEM OF TRAIT-NAMES

"Language excels in unconscious insight the acumen of the most talented thinker, and we contend that whoever, having the right talent, should do nothing but examine the words and phrases which deal with the human soul, would know more about it than all the sages who omitted to do so, and would know perhaps a thousand times more than has ever been discovered by observation, apparatus, and experiment upon man."

—LUDWIG KLAGES, The Science of Character, p. 74.

1. THE ORIGIN OF TRAIT-NAMES

More than a century ago Jeremy Bentham maintained that the chief obstacle to clear thinking lay in the confused process of naming. Words are ordinarily and uncritically assumed to correspond to "real entities" but more often than not they signify merely "fictitious" or "fabulous entities" having no correspondence to the "substances" of nature. Although every field of knowledge is plagued by this deception, psychology especially, whenever it attempts to name the "powers" of the human mind, is threatened by the dangers of hypostatization. Bentham did not deny that there were basic "springs of human action,"—real entities of motivation. He simply denied that the common use of language adequately represented them. He was optimistic enough to believe that a more critical use of language, in particular a search for "neutral" rather than "censorial" terms, would remedy matters.[1]

Now the origin of trait-names in any language seems to be two-fold. In the first place men experience a desire to represent by name such mental processes or dispositions of their fellows as can be determined by observation or by inference. There is a demand for depicting personality as accurately and as faithfully as possible, for with a suitable term, corresponding to authentic psychological dispositions, the ability to understand and to control one's fellows is greatly enhanced. There is then reason to suppose that trait-names are not entirely arbitrary, that they are to some extent self-correcting, for there is little to gain by preserving through names erroneous belief in merely fictitious or fabulous entities; there is everything to gain by using terms that designate true psychic structures. If this consideration were the only basis underlying our vocabulary of trait-names we should find the correspondence between linguistic convention and psychological truth very close, much closer than it actually is.

There is, unfortunately for scientific psychology, a second influence determining our lexicon of trait-names, namely the tendency of each social epoch to characterize human qualities in the light of standards and interests peculiar to the times. Historically, the introduction of trait-names can be seen to follow this principle of cultural (not psychological) determination to a striking degree. Presumably human beings through countless ages had displayed such qualities as devotion, pity, and patience, but these terms were not established with their present meanings until the Church made of them recognized and articulated Christian virtues.

Many other illustrations might be given.[2] Astrological superstition produced lunatic, jovial, saturnine, and mercurial. Galenian medicine which prevailed in England until the time of Harvey brought the term temperament, and with it quite naturally, sanguine, choleric, melancholic, phlegmatic, good-humored, bad-humored, as well as cold-blooded, hearty, heartless, and cordial (derived from the belief that the heart was the seat of the intellect and feeling). Following the Protestant Reformation came some of our most indispensable trait-adjectives, reflecting the introspectiveness of the period, among them, sincere, pious, bigoted, precise, fanatic, also the substantives, self-regard, self-assurance, self-love, self-confidence, and self-esteem. Selfish is a term coined by the Presbyterians about 1640. To the aristocratic XVIIth Century belong fatuous, callous, countrified, disingenuous. Political upheavals are responsible for such terms as Tory, democrat, and radical.

[2] The illustrations here used have been drawn from the New Oxford English Dictionary and from the compilation of Logan Pearsall Smith, The English Language, New York: Holt, 1912. Pp. 254.

With the growing subjectivity of literature in the XVIIIth Century came numerous terms derived from self-analysis: day-dream, depression, ennui, chagrin, apathy, diffidence; and new (more subjective) meanings were attached to older terms, reverie, excitement, constraint, embarrassment, disappointment and others. In courtly circles in the XVIIIth Century persons were described as prim, demure, gawky, enthusiastic, interesting, and boresome. To recent years belong a surprising number of new expressions, still for the most part slang: booster, rooter, knocker, hoodlum, climber, yes-man, four-flusher, crabber, cake-eater, chiseler, gigolo, flapper, racketeer, Babbitt. To this ever increasing vocabulary of human characteristics psychology has contributed its share: introverted, extroverted, neurotic, regressive, psychasthenic, eidetic, cyclothymic, schizoid, and the like.

It is therefore certain that trait-names are not univocal symbols corresponding throughout the ages to fixed varieties of human dispositions. In spite of the fact that the names probably would not have been invented unless there were something "really there" in the psychic make-up of individuals to call forth the new designations, still the symbols themselves are changeable and elusive. They are invented in accordance with cultural demands, their meaning often varies, and some fall rapidly into disuse.[3]

In ordinary life we use trait-names with considerable confidence, but the predicaments that result are well known to psychologists. Supposing a consulting clinician after making a careful and objective study of Peter's personality concludes that Peter is introverted and submissive in nature. The clinician no doubt means to imply that Peter possesses two stable neuropsychic dispositions symbolized by these two descriptive terms. But has he assurance that the words chosen do symbolize dispositions actually possessed by Peter? Perhaps in using two terms he may be dividing a pattern that is in reality unified, or he may be uniting under two rubrics innumerable neuropsychic dispositions that are in point of fact independent of one another. Even if he has succeeded in identifying two of Peter's traits accurately, he finds to his consternation that the same trait-names can be applied to Paul whose introverted and submissive behavior is unlike Peter's! And to make matters worse, these verbal characterizations are interpreted by other people according to their own habits of thought, and their "understanding" of Peter from the clinical description may be far removed from the psychological situation that the psychologist is endeavoring to represent. The naming of traits is, then, a perilous matter. In selecting symbols the clinical psychologist tries, if possible, to designate with their aid the intangible, but at the same time objective, neuropsychic dispositions of personality. He tries also to select his symbols in such a way that they communicate to others without misrepresentation the dispositions that he believes that he has discovered. But there are many possible slips in this complex process of observation, discovery, naming, and communication.

2. The Commonsense and Realistic View

In spite of the doubt that we have just cast upon the correspondence between trait-names and traits themselves, the position of common sense (naïve realism) has a certain plausibility.

Long ago, Francis Bacon pondering the problem of human dispositions concluded that it is "one of those things wherein the common discourse of men is wiser than books—a thing which seldom happens."[4] The common discourse that Bacon praised assumes, of course, a close correspondence between linguistic symbols and personal qualities. The prevalence of this simple point of view in everyday life cannot be questioned. Even the philosopher who professes to believe that words do not correspond to natural fact does not hesitate to act in practical life as if they did so. He maintains, for example, that his opponent is obstinate and conceited, and that his wife is devoted and generous, and means thereby that his opponent and his wife possess the qualities he ascribed to them. Even the psychologist who inveighs against traits, and denies that their symbolic existence conforms to "real existence" will nevertheless write a convincing letter of recommendation to prove that one of his favorite students is "trustworthy, self-reliant, and keenly critical." It may be, as Bacon holds, that the common discourse of these scholars is wiser than their books.

This commonsense view of trait-names is somewhat analogous to the view that syntactical forms are closely related to basic psychic processes. E. E. Southard, for example, has pointed to the resemblance between the four grammatical moods (the imperative, indicative, subjunctive, and optative) and the traditional temperaments (the choleric, the phlegmatic, the melancholic, and sanguine, respectively).[5] Southard proposes also to classify the delusional systems of psychopathic patients with the aid of such grammatical rubrics as tense, voice, mood, person, and number. Rhetorical categories, he maintains, are superior to all others, for they possess precisely the subjectivity that is necessary for a sympathetic mental analysis.[6] A Realist would undoubtedly agree that syntax has evolved as a veridical expression of mental processes, but he would also extend the argument from grammatical form to lexical content. Words, like grammar, are the productions of necessity, invented and sustained by virtue of their correspondence to mental structures and mental functions. The underlying correspondence is not affected by the difficulty of discovering just what the symbol on occasion is intended to convey. A relationship that is difficult to trace is not necessarily a relationship that does not exist.

The Scholastic Realists held similar convictions, although they were less psychologically-minded. They held that common terms designate "universals" having an existence apart from individual events. Goodness is not simply a collective term for innumerable individual acts unrelated excepting in the percipient's mind. The "fact" of goodness is universal; it is more extended, more lasting and more real than the single activities to which the term is applied. The universals, of course, are essentially Platonic Ideas. It was held by some that there are as many Ideas as there are common names: every common name if rightly employed represents an Idea just as every proper name designates an individual.

Confronted with our problem the scholastic Realist no doubt would argue as follows. There are numerous eternal Ideas or universals which are the archetypes of personality. Any single individual represents an incarnation of many, though not necessarily all, of these universals. Trait-names, even though they are social inventions, are nonetheless symbols for these universals which men intuitively recognize. Cowardliness, for example, exists not in single activities which are merely its manifestations or "accidents." As a universal cowardliness resides in the realm of essences. It is an archetype or true pattern after which individual natures are in varying degrees modeled.

Unlike the naïve realism of common sense this view becomes metapsychological. Instead of holding that symbols are directly related to neuropsychic entities of an individual order, it holds that the relation exists only through the intervening plane of Ideas. It is this idealistic assumption that underlies the methodology of Dilthey and Spranger in their geisteswissenschaftliche studies of personality. According to this school of thought the empirical observation of single individuals never can reveal the basic constitution of human traits. More valuable is the study of "ideal types" of which individual beings are impure and mixed examples. The essence of the "aesthetic value," for example, must be understood in its conceptual purity, for individual instances are but confused and transient reflections thereof. This form of anti-empiricism leads away from the naïve realism of common sense and from the interest of the empirical psychologist seeking practical guidance in relating trait-names to the dispositions of single concrete personalities. There is a marked difference between psychological realism and philosophical realism. The former is content with circumscribed "reals" having definite locus in the single organism; the latter seeks its reals in the realm of a universal mind.

3. The Nominalistic View

The Nominalist, on the other hand, denies that verbal cleavages and distinctions represent any corresponding separations and segregations in rerum natura. To him names are names and nothing more. He denies the correspondence of linguistic symbols to universals. He goes even further and denies the existence of universals. Our knowledge, he argues, is always of particulars and the various abstractions that we may make from the multifarious concrete objects of knowledge do not constitute a reality of a new order.

From this point of view trait-names along with all other names are regarded as hollow and unsubstantial. It is easy to find instances of nominalism in contemporary discussions of personality. For instance, P. M. Symonds writes,

> "Psychology has suffered grievously in the past from an exuberance of imagination on the part of its builders which has led them to create concepts with no corresponding reality as proved by their demolition by later experimentation. Hypostatization is the name the logicians give to this fallacy. The whole faculty psychology was erected by assigning a reality, concreteness, and independence to certain concepts of mental life that subsequent investigation shows do not have a corresponding independent existence. Likewise the present trait psychology is under the very strongest suspicion of being similarly unfounded. This should put every investigator on his guard against creating psychological fiction by the very names which he assigns to his tests." [7]

The following quotation represents the same point of view, and illustrates further the interesting fact that because the heritage of language is ancient and the science of personality recent, modern psychologists are suspicious, almost jealous, of the wisdom contained in our common speech.

> "Language responses developed before anything was known of the sensorimotor organization of the individual and before it was known that all of human behavior was the result of sensorimotor function. As a result the categories of human behavior are linguistically classified more on the basis of individual and social survival than upon their relation to sensorimotor function. However, many different sensorimotor functions may be equivalent from the standpoint of survival."

The author of this quotation, A. P. Weiss, illustrates his argument with reference to benevolence. This trait-name, he insists, covers a multitude of organically unrelated sensorimotor responses. It is not a biophysical fact that one benevolent act is related to another, but a mere conceptual fact, originating within and preserved by considerations of social value.

"From the sensorimotor standpoint these actions are all different, but because they have the same biosocial effect they may be classified as having the type of equivalence which is indicated by the term, benevolence." [8]

This argument belongs to that form of nominalism that regards words as verbal blankets covering a certain "distance in a range of judgment." The word green, for example, stands for many distinguishable steps in the spectrum between yellow and blue. There are light greens and dark greens, pure greens and gray-greens, greens of springtime and greens of autumn. Similarly in the case of benevolence, there are many kinds of acts which fall within the range of conduct to which the term by common consent applies. A trait-name, the Nominalist says, covers some perceived similarities in conduct, but to perceive similarity, he points out, is often simply a failure to perceive analytically. In no case does the trait-name signify a single, homogenous biophysical structure.

4. Restatement

The Realist thinks that in one way or another, with a greater or less degree of fidelity, trait-names indicate corresponding realities. In Scholastic philosophy these realities are regarded as subsisting in the realm of ideas; they are trans-individual. The neuropsychic dispositions of the individual may be considered as incomplete copies of these universals. In answer to the Nominalist who regards names as mere designations of a range of perceived similarities, the Realist would reply that the recognition of similarities is itself a demonstration of the objective validity of universals. For example, all greens, even though they are appreciably different, have an unquestionable affinity. They are similar in some respect, and it is in this respect that the universal itself subsists. Likewise, benevolent acts of various philanthropists have an affinity from which is to be inferred some type of universal of which their individual conduct is but a reflection.

[8] A. P. Weiss, in Psychologies of 1930. Worcester: Clark Univ. Press; p. 305.

Naïve or commonsense Realism does not employ such exalted conceptions as that of "universals," but simply assumes that trait-names applied to individuals represent authentic component structures of their personalities. The ordinary man feels that names would not exist unless there were corresponding natural facts waiting to be symbolized.

The Nominalist on the other hand sees trait-names as traps, devised by the exigencies of social discourse, completely misleading so far as psychic facts are concerned. At best a trait-name represents a range of apparently similar behavior-tendencies. Applied to an individual it can only mean that his conduct is in many instances perceived as roughly consistent. The conduct may, however, in fact be totally unorganized. Merely because it is perceived as constellated into a trait does not make it so organized in a psychophysical sense. And adding a trait-name to a falsely perceived consistency does not bring a trait into being. "Traits cannot exist by fiat." [9]

It is apparent that the dispute involves not merely the significance of trait-names but also the entire question of the existence of traits. Are there such "entities" in the psychological depths of a man's nature, or are they altogether fictitious monstrosities? And if traits are admitted at all, how should they be regarded? When these questions are answered we shall be in a better position to frame our theory of the significance of trait-names.

5. The Nature of Traits

Any scientific study of personality makes the assumption that dynamic systems, sub-structures, or elements of some kind are to be found within the total complex pattern of personality. But even though there is general agreement upon this basic proposition, there is little uniformity of opinion regarding the nature of the constituent elements that should be sought. Five contrasting theories may be mentioned, each having its adherents among current investigators. Four will be outlined briefly, and the fifth, having a particularly close relation to the purpose of this monograph, will be presented in somewhat more detail.

(1) Psychologists often attempt to carry over the categories of general psychology into the field of personality. Any writer who sees the individual as a special pattern of instincts and sentiments represents this point of view. Personality is merely an arrangement of common nomothetic mental constituents. What serves for the "generalized human mind" serves also for mind-in-particular. This view is current among those who regard the psychology of personality as coextensive with the psychology of individual differences.[10] The elements of personality may be sensations, abilities, needs, attitudes, as well as instincts or sentiments—any processes, in fact, that have been differentiated and accepted by general psychology. Because of its preoccupation with these standard categories, and its insistence that the individual should be regarded merely as an incident in the search for laws and uniformities of "the generalized mind," this view may be labeled the orthodox nomothetic view.

(2) Quite similar is the position held by psychoanalytic writers who proceed from the assumption that the structure of all personalities is essentially the same. In all people, the three-fold hierarchy of Super-ego, Ego, and Id is the dependable initial fact. In addition to these three levels Freudian psychologists posit uniform mechanisms to account for their functional interrelations: repression, fixation, identification, and the like. Even the basic content of the emotional natures of all men is essentially uniform: the Œdipus complex, guilt feelings, aggression, anxiety, and so on. In therapy of course the peculiar individual pattern is admitted. But it is believed that individuality emerges only from altering the stress and proportions of these basic structures and mechanisms. The constitution of personality is uniform. The psychoanalytic view differs from the orthodox psychological view only in conceiving the components of personality in a more dynamic fashion. It might suitably be called a dynamic nomothetic view of the composition of personality.

[10] The differences between the psychology of personality and differential psychology have been pointed out by Allport and Vernon, Studies in Expressive Movement, 1933. New York: Macmillan; pp. viii f.

(3) There is a familiar anti-trait theory known as specificity. It sees the elements of personality in specific stimulus-response bonds, at the level of habit. People, it is observed, sometimes behave very differently in different environments or under slightly changed conditions. "A man may be neat about his person and slovenly about his desk." Many experimental investigations are cited to prove that there is little intercorrelation among responses or forms of conduct even where on a priori grounds a high degree of consistency is assumed to exist. Thus Hartshorne and May found little tendency for children who are dishonest in spelling lessons to be dishonest in accepting too much money when it is offered them at a store. The point of view of the specificists holds that the elementary units of personality must be regarded as narrow. "Personality consists of millions of specific habits." But since this statement of the case seems even to the specificists to be somewhat exaggerated, they point to the possibility that habits may after all be inter-dependent in proportion to their possession of identical elements. These elements occurring either in stimulus situations or in "traces" cause sufficient cross-conditioning and redintegration to give the appearance of generalization in behavior. But fundamentally the component structures of personality remain specific and of a lowly order.[11] No true generalization leading to the emergence of traits occurs.

(4) A recent view that has received widespread allegiance among statistical psychologists is the theory of "unique" or "pure" traits. With the aid of factor-analysis some investigators have been led to oppose the specificists and to discover units of a distinctly more complex order than simple habits. The establishment of these units, called "factors," is a purely empirical and statistical matter, depending upon the "independent" components that can be isolated whenever a battery of tests or scales is administered to a large population of subjects. Many scales, it has been found, even though they purport to measure different dispositions, do in fact overlap to a considerable extent, and it is thought that the overlap should be eliminated by bringing all independent variance under a single purified rubric. The purpose behind the procedure is stated by Lorge, "To be useful in psychology a trait must be regarded as freed from the influence of other traits." [12] Independence is secured by determining the overlap between various scales and then by rescoring the scales according to the number of non-correlating factors they have been found to contain, usually not more than two or three. After applying this procedure to existing scales it becomes imperative to re-name the traits, since when all overlapping has been consolidated into new and independent factors, the original intent of the scales is lost, and their original names are no longer applicable.

[11] This point of view may be found in The Nature of Conduct and in Diagnosing Personality and Conduct, both by P. M. Symonds, and a critique of this position in the J. Soc. Psychol., 1932, 3, 391–398.

The difficulty of naming independent factors thus discovered is very great.[13] Furthermore, since the factors established by this method are wholly dependent on the scales employed, the introduction of new scales seriously alters the nature of the factorial variables. Finally, as with other nomothetic views, the method makes the assumption that all people do in fact possess the same basic constitution of personality. Factors are established through the use of a whole population of subjects, and these factors seldom seem to correspond to the varieties of personal dispositions that are identified by clinical methods. These limitations of method and the debatable assumptions of factorial psychology have led critics to argue that "pure" or "unique" traits are simply artifacts, and as such have doubtful value in representing the organic structure of personality.

(5) The trait-hypothesis, on the other hand, pretends to deal not with artifactual but with genuine components of personality. With factor-analysis, the trait-hypothesis has only one point of agreement, namely the conviction that generalized and complex dispositions offer a more plausible picture of the structure of personality than do the elementary habits of which specificists speak. The trait-hypothesis, however, differs sharply from factor-analysis on the issue of the "independence" of traits, holding a contrary position, namely that "pure" traits are not to be expected in mental organization, for in fact nothing in mental life is altogether independent of other influences. It differs also on the issue of the universal nature of the factors, holding that "basic" traits emerging from studies of a total population are artificial. True traits must be discovered in each individual life separately through the use of more direct clinical and experimental methods.

[12] I. Lorge, op. cit.

[13] Cf. Review of R. C. Perry, A Group Factor Analysis of the Adjustment Questionnaire. Character and Personality, 1934, 3, 169 f.

Traits are regarded as personal dispositions, overlapping one another in structure and in function, but nonetheless possessed of focal characteristics. (Although the neural counterparts of such focal dispositions are not in the least understood, the present trend in theories of brain physiology makes it no harder to conceive such dispositions in neural terms than to think in terms of neural grooves in which more specific and elementary habits were once supposed to reside.) Traits may originate through the integration of many similar specific habits of adjustment, but with time the organization takes upon itself a generalized character, and its influence upon behavior is determinative in a broad sense. It is not the specific acts of the individual, but rather these broad patterns of determining tendencies that confer upon personality such consistency as it displays.[14]

Wherever generalized determining tendencies can be identified in a single life they may with propriety be called traits, provided that they have a "personalized" character, that is to say, provided they are bound up with the psychological adaptations which the individual makes to his environment. Highly specific habits or temporary Aufgaben are, of course, determining tendencies, but since they are not intricately related to other similar determinants they lack the generality required in a trait. Also purely "impersonal" actions, e.g., systems of glandular interrelations and digestive sequences, lack sufficient involvement in the processes of psychological adjustment, to be considered in themselves traits of personality.

Under certain conditions special classes of traits may be distinguished and selected for study: e.g., generalized attitudes, generalized interests, values, or philosophies of life. Trait is the genus proximum within which these special classes may be differentiated. Not all attitudes, of course, are at the same time traits. An attitude toward an object of food or toward a single person is altogether too specific to be called a trait. Only those attitudes that are activated by a wide variety of objects, and are sufficiently variable in the conduct they provoke can be classed as traits. For instance, a generalized radical attitude directed toward all or many features of the social environment may with equal propriety be called either an attitude or a trait.[15] Esthetic taste may properly be called an interest or a trait. A consistent religious bent may be called a value or a trait. A Machiavellian or Tolstoyan outlook upon life may also be called a trait, since any such Weltanschauung fulfills admirably the criteria: it is a personalized determining tendency with an unusual breadth of application in conduct.

[14] Cf. G. W. Allport, What is a Trait of Personality? J. Abnorm. & Soc. Psychol., 1931, 25, 368–372.

At the other extreme we discover minor, non-extended traits within every personality, ranging down to the more specific forms of determining tendencies where "habits" and "conditioned reflexes" are ordinarily preferred designations. Here again there are border-line cases where either the term "habit" or "trait" might be applied. A man, for example, may be said to have a habit of talking rapidly or a trait of rapid speech. The choice of terms in this case would depend somewhat upon the range of occasions which provoke rapid speech, and somewhat upon the extent to which speed is regarded as characteristic of his motor performances.

The trait hypothesis does not assume that all men possess the same traits, or that differences between personalities are merely quantitative differences. On the contrary, it contends rather that no two men possess precisely the same trait. Every life has a unique history, and in the course of its developmental struggles it attains correspondingly unique patterns of mental organization. The trait-hypothesis maintains only that such unique patterns do exist as dynamic sub-structures within personalities, and that they play a determinative rôle in conduct.

Although traits are strictly personal and unique forms of adjustment, a few seem common enough to be regarded as comparable from one individual to another. These might be called common or scalable traits. Perhaps ascendance, submission, perseverance, possibly introversion, extroversion, and various generalized social attitudes and interests are examples of scalable traits. They represent modes of adjustment which most individuals are forced to develop (albeit in differing degrees) in our standard civilized environment. But if we attempt such scaling we should remember that we are likely to constrain personalities unnaturally in fitting them into one mould. In reality, of course, each life lends to each trait—even to these "common" traits—an altogether peculiar coloring. Measurement is possible only if we blindly insist that people are comparable in respect to each "common" trait. The artifice is perhaps justified by the practical advantages of using "personality tests," but the method must not be regarded as theoretically perfect.

Concerning the question of "independence" the trait-hypothesis insists that no strictly independent compartments in mental life are ever found, and that therefore we must dispense with the methodological ideal of pure or independent traits. Let us illustrate the difference between the point of view of factor-analysis (the theory of "unique traits") and the trait-hypothesis with the aid of a current controversy. It has been found that certain scales purporting to measure "introversion" have high correlations with other scales purporting to measure "neuroticism." Factor-analysts, guided by pragmatic convenience, wish to consolidate the overlap in the two scales (as determined from the responses of a whole population of subjects), and to rechristen the new "independent" factor something suggestive of both neuroticism and introversion.

The trait-hypothesis on the contrary would argue as follows: In one particular individual, a state of neurotic anxiety or neurotic compulsion may be so pervasive, that all of the symptoms of "introversion" displayed in this particular life should properly be regarded merely as manifestations of this cardinal trait of neuroticism. Therefore the trait-name neuroticism should be kept in this case and the term introversion should not be used at all. In another individual there may also be a neurotic conflict influencing his behavior, but likewise in this case a different focal disposition, true introversion relatively unaffected by the conflict. In this instance, it is more definitive and more exact to ascribe two traits to the individual; they are distinguishable both in the clinical portrait and through a study of the life-history. A third person may in fact not be " neurotic " at all. His dominant trait is introversion, uncomplicated by the symptoms of unconscious conflict that are commonly displayed by neurotic people. In this case the term introversion is more accurate. In all these three instances, it is meaningless to try to solve the problem of the relation between neuroticism and introversion by statistical methods. The average tendencies of a whole population of people cannot be consulted when personalized dispositions of single people are at issue. A pale unnamable blend of introversion and neuroticism established by factor analysis as an " independent trait " might in fact represent no genuine component of any single personality; it will be an artifact derived from the imaginary " average man."

The trait-hypothesis is broad. It prescribes no list or classification of traits; it does not regard them as measurable excepting in a remote and approximate sense; it allows for overlap. Whenever in a given life on the basis of dependable evidence it seems that the dispositions of an individual have different foci, or points of stress, they may be considered as different traits, even though there is often a complex interrelation among them.

The proper attitude for the psychologist to assume concerning the relation between traits and trait-names will be discussed in the following section. Let it only be stated here that the trait-hypothesis does not commit the fallacy of verbal magic; it does not hold that traits pop into existence as soon as they are named. The names are often merely oblique representations of dispositions that are known to exist. One man may characterize a friend as cautious, a second may consider him timid, a third thinks he is cowardly. Obviously each is trying to represent a situation that all three recognize as existing within the personality in question. One of these designations may in point of fact be more apt than the others, or conceivably all three may be inexact. The empirical discovery of traits in individual lives is one problem, that of selecting the most appropriate names for the traits thus discovered is another.

6. The Significance of Trait-names

If traits are viewed as complex focal dispositions of a personal order there seems to be no more reason to question their "existence" than there is to deny as psychophysical facts a "habit of smoking," an "integration of language responses," or the presence of "general concepts" in the mind. These long-accepted "entities" stand in fully as grave a peril of hypostatization as does a "trait." The danger of naming traits is no greater in principle than the danger of naming any other type of mental organization.

In criticizing the concept of trait nominalistic and specificistic writers think that they are inveighing against the ancient blunders of Faculty Psychology. They recall that once upon a time it was customary for psychologists to conceive some "power of the mind" (such as Attention, Will, or Sagacity) and by naming it to regard the power as fixed and self-active. But traits are not such powers of the mind, but are merely facts of mental organization peculiar to each individual. The recognized integrative and organizing functions of the nervous system give us every reason to believe that there is organic coherence in conduct, and trait-names are simply an attempt to designate such forms of this organic coherence as can be reliably established for a given personality.

On the other hand, the position of the naïve realist regarding trait-names is far too simple. The Nominalists are right in declaring names to be socially invented signs, by no means perfect designations of what is going on materially in the depths of nature. Trait-names are not themselves traits. At best they indicate roughly and somewhat haphazardly the possibility of traits. The only certain deduction that can be drawn from a trait-name is that on one or more occasions some person employed it in an attempt to communicate a judgment made concerning the conduct of some individual.

Nor should we, after the manner of the Scholastics, regard the 17,953 trait-names in the English language as designations for an equal number of Heavenly Originals, or essences, out of which all personalities are as "accidents" compounded. The names are rather conceptual categories applied to those human dispositions which are thought to be roughly comparable. Each individual differs in every one of his traits from every other individual. Only the exigencies of discourse and a kind of "instinct of combinations" provoke us to use the same trait-names to designate similar traits in different people. We find our way through the forests of human nature by certain blunt schemes of generalization and verbalization. The effect of words is to enforce upon us a practical simplification of reality. Through rigid necessity we infer the existence of traits; but in characterizing these traits in different individuals we can use only coarse rubrics (trait-names) to cover a whole range of actual traits.[16]

There are other reasons why the vocabulary of trait-names in any language cannot be considered to be an exact inventory of human dispositions. For one thing, the terms originated from motives far too mixed and untrustworthy to be a scientific guide. In part they indicate vices and virtues, and are heavily freighted with blame and praise. They provide a vocabulary of character as well as of personality, and character, which is the evaluation of the social and moral significance of conduct, is not a psychological problem. Terms like good, bad, worthy, undesirable, disgusting, useful, or perfect, though frequently applied to people, are purely censorial, and have absolutely no direct reference to personality.

[16] The psychologist who prepares a scale by which he hopes to measure an entire population for introversion-extroversion or ascendance-submission should not imply that these traits are identically formed in all people. He should imply merely that in his opinion people may profitably be compared by the rough scale in respect to certain traits which by virtue of a common humanity and common environment, may be thought of as similar.

Many traits never receive a name. Littérateurs, psychologists and the makers of slang continually invent new designations for human nature, thus proving our current vocabulary to be insufficient. And even while the catalogue of trait-names is expanding to accommodate these inventions, it is likewise contracting through the obsolescence of terms. Vocabularies are limited by human intelligence, and as soon as terms multiply beyond the range of usefulness, many of them are forgotten. The unfamiliarity of a large proportion of the trait-names in our list proves that our practical vocabulary is inadequate to the task of representing the complex phenomena of human nature that have been observed and in by-gone times linguistically recorded.

Single terms often seem inept and inadequate for all but the commonplace descriptions. For this reason innumerable phrases, compounds, idioms, and metaphors have been developed. This fact can but be interpreted to mean that, however rich the accumulation of trait-names may be, it still falls far short of the range of human traits that we endeavor to depict.

There is, of course, still a portion of plausibility in the argument of commonsense Realists. Linguistic symbols have demonstrated utility; they have been tested throughout the ages for their power of representing stable facts of experience. If many human beings were not in fact egotistic, aggressive, or timid, the epithets would not have found a permanent place in language. If traits exist at all it is natural and proper to name them. The process of naming is not hypostatization or " verbal magic " any more than is the naming of any of the organizations which occur in nature.

It is a good maxim in psychological investigation that the discovery of traits in the individual should precede the naming. Clinically the maxim has usually been observed. Psychoanalysts have been particularly active in coining terms to fit their discoveries. Naturally the more often a disposition (or, better, a range of similar dispositions) is encountered in the population the more chance it has of being christened. Experimental psychologists too have also invented many trait-names, although they are somewhat more inclined to become interested first in some commonly accepted trait-name, and then to submit it, as they would any hypothesis, to an empirical study. Often their experimentation leads to a confirmation and acceptance of the trait-name. It turns out to be one that may properly be employed in the construction of a test or rating-scale. At other times, this confirmation is not forthcoming. Certain investigators, for example, have experimented with honesty, originality, self-confidence, and the like, and report that they fail to find consistent traits to correspond to these names in their populations of subjects. Such negative results should properly be interpreted to mean that the trait in question (as defined by the investigator) is not common enough to be scaled. These results never mean that certain individuals may not possess the trait. Proof of the lack of uniformity of a trait in a population is by no means proof that some individuals may not possess the trait in a well-organized and consistent fashion.

The theory we present then holds that trait-names are symbols socially devised (from a mixture of ethical, cultural and psychological interests) for the naming and evaluation of human qualities. Some of these terms are obviously censorial and as such have little utility for the psychologist. The non-censorial terms, however, are significant, for their common usage establishes a presupposition that some human beings possess actual dispositions or traits roughly corresponding to these symbols. There are, however, many more traits than any list of single names would indicate, for we often find neologisms, phrases, and metaphors called upon where trait-names are insufficient.

In scientific work no single trait-name can be accepted with assurance as applicable to a given personality until its correspondence with a true trait has been experimentally or clinically established. Traits cannot be called forth by fiat; they must be discovered.

The use of the same trait-name applied to any two different individuals signifies merely that the dispositions of both fall within a range of comparable judgments.

Although in some respects this theory follows the position of the Nominalists it does not agree at all with those extremists who in denying perfect correspondence between names and traits think they must also deny the very existence of traits. Traits exist in exactly the same sense in which any mental disposition or readiness-for-response exists. The naming of such intangible mental states is hazardous, but it is also unfortunately necessary. It would be absurd to allow the difficulties involved to lead us into the wholly untenable nihilistic position of denying mental organization and readiness altogether.

A trait-name is a range-name. Although traits are real enough entities, trait-names are essentially blankets, covering one trait in one person and other (similar) traits in other people. Though perceived as similar and labeled identically the trait is never, strictly speaking, in two different human beings exactly the same.

PART B: METHOD OF CLASSIFICATION

7. Previous Studies of Trait-names

In spite of the fact that psychologists occasionally cast glances toward the wealth of material that awaits them in the treasury of common speech, there have as yet been very few psycho-lexical investigations. The problem of trait-names is one of those that have often been referred to, and a few characterological writers have made preliminary studies, but none has thus far been completed. Fifty years ago Sir Francis Galton wrote the following account of his own skirmish with the problem.

> "We must guard ourselves against supposing that the moral faculties which we distinguish by different names, as courage, sociability, niggardliness, are separate entities. On the contrary, they are so intermixed that they are never single in action. I tried to gain an idea of the number of the more conspicuous aspects of the character by counting in an appropriate dictionary the words used to express them. Roget's Thesaurus was selected for that purpose, and I examined many pages of its index here and there as samples of the whole, and estimated that it contained fully one thousand words expressive of character, each of which has a separate shade of meaning, while each shares a large part of its meaning with some of the rest." [17]

In 1910 G. E. Partridge offered as a "partial list of terms in English which describe mental traits," a schedule of approximately 750 adjectives.[18] More recently M. L. Perkins reported the commencement of a study based upon the 400,000 terms included in Webster's New International Dictionary from which she estimates the number of names of "traits and ideals" to be about 3,000.[19] L. Klages estimates that in German there are 4,000 words descriptive of "inner states." [20] A. Gesell tells of his unfinished attempt to classify the adjectives which describe human behavior under six rubrics: (1) terms indicating intellectual characteristics, (2) terms indicating amount of energy, (3) terms indicating reactions as a member of a social group, (4) terms indicating degree of independence and responsibility, (5) terms indicating prevailing mood and emotional control, (6) terms indicating development of moral sense.[21]

The Trait Book published by the Eugenics Record Office aims "to afford a vocabulary for the use of those who are attempting the analysis of personality."[22] It includes approximately 3,000 entries, but over half of these pertain to physical peculiarities (abscess, acne, albinism, ingrowing toenails, and the like), and many others are racial or occupational designations. The classification includes relatively few psychological trait-names.

The only classification of trait-names according to psychological principles carried to completion is that of F. Baumgarten.[23] Her list contains 941 adjectives and 688 nouns in the German language; but since many words appear in both forms, the list is reduced to 1,093 separate terms. Baumgarten's sources were various dictionaries and scattered terms found in the writings of characterologists. Her criterion for selection was her own definition of trait (Eigenschaft): "a constant and directed psychical force (Richtkraft) which determines the active and reactive behavior of a man in his environment." This definition, she says, is intended to include those sub-structures of personality that are serviceable in preserving, expressing, or advancing the interests of the individual. According to her criterion she would seem to be listing essentially the same class of words that fall into Column I in the present tabulation (the minimum and most indispensable list).

Baumgarten, however, fails to distinguish sharply enough between neutral and censorial terms. That it is difficult to do so our own list will reveal; but there is little excuse for the intrusion into her schedule of such purely evaluative words as schlecht and unwürdig. The fact that Baumgarten has in her total classification only about one-quarter as many terms as occur in our Column I, is no doubt due to the fact that she selected only terms in frequent use.

8. Criteria of Classification

The list that follows contains all the words descriptive of personality or personal behavior (save those that are obsolete) included in Webster's New International Dictionary. The edition used (1925) comprises approximately 400,000 separate terms or derivatives. Our list contains in all 17,953 words, or 4½% of the total English vocabulary. A very few common terms, chiefly slang, have been added, but no attempt has been made to follow systematically any other source than Webster's Dictionary.

The criterion for inclusion consists in the capacity of any term to distinguish the behavior of one human being from that of another. Terms representing common (non-distinctive) behavior are excluded, e.g., walking and digesting, whereas more differentiating and stylistic terms applied to these same activities, such as mincing and dyspeptic, are included. In many cases the application of this criterion involved a considerable degree of arbitrariness. In deciding doubtful cases the dictionary definition was followed: if in any of its meanings a term might be differentially employed in characterizing personal behavior it was admitted.

Adjectival and participial forms have been preferred throughout; nouns and adverbs appear only where no corresponding adjective or participle exists, or else in cases where their meaning is distinctive (e.g., both Quaker and Quakerish are included). Various adjectival variants of a word are given only when the shades of meaning are readily distinguishable. A person may be sour because of innate temperamental constitution; the term soured implies some environmental genesis; and sourish indicates a difference in degree and perhaps a difference in kind. All three terms are included. With many other word-forms the differentiation is non-semantic: vagaries of morphological development rather than the need for precise distinctions in meaning are responsible for such clusters as atrabilarian, atrabilarious, atrabiliar, atrabiliarious, atrabiliary, and atrabilious. The classification avoids such useless duplications and lists only the most common form.

Terms appearing below the line in Webster are either derivative forms or uncommon. Since this distinction has practically no psychological significance, terms below the line are admitted in the present classification if they fulfill our criteria for inclusion. The result of including Scotch and borrowed foreign terms as well as those that are dialectical English, archaic or rare, is a somewhat cumbersome word-list in which probably half the terms seem strange and unfamiliar to the American reader. Certainly the list is much longer than it need be for practical use, but any attempt to exclude uncommon and unfamiliar words would be extremely subjective. From the standpoints of the psychology of personality and psycho-linguistics the complete record is of more value.

As stated in the Preface a four-fold plan of classification is used. Although this scheme finds both practical and theoretical justification it requires many arbitrary decisions. Opinions might differ concerning the placement of a large proportion of the words, without, it may be truly said, altering the value of the four-part analysis. The first column includes names directly applicable to human traits in the sense in which the term " trait " is employed in this monograph (cf. Sect. 5). If this column were extended by relocating terms now appearing in the other columns, or if it were shortened by eliminating some of the doubtful cases, the value and significance of the column as a whole would not be altered. The same may be said respecting the constitution of the three remaining columns. It is, of course, not to be denied that other principles of classification are equally applicable; (Roget's Thesaurus is an example of classification according to a wholly different principle). But the principle which we here follow (after a good deal of preliminary experimentation with alternative schemes) is especially fruitful.

Column I. In this column appear those names that seem to symbolize most clearly "real" traits of personality. They designate generalized and personalized determining tendencies—consistent and stable modes of an individual's adjustment to his environment. Obvious examples are aggressive, introverted, sociable. These terms do not imply merely temporary and specific behavior as do the terms in Column II; they are more neutral and less censorial than those in Column III; and they are less metaphorical and remote in their applicability to personality than those in Column IV. On the other hand, since the decision is often arbitrary, the investigator using our list is advised not to depend upon Column I alone, but to consult the parallel columns for added terms according to his needs and interests. The intention of this first column is to provide merely a minimum list of trait-names and not a final list. The number of terms in this column is 4,504, or 25 per cent of the total list.

Column II. This column contains terms descriptive of present activity, temporary states of mind, and mood. The criterion for inclusion reads as follows: "Might the quality in question characterize a person's mood, emotion, present attitude, or present activity (but not his enduring and recurring modes of adjustment)?" Typical terms in this column are abashed, gibbering, rejoicing, frantic. The majority of these terms are present participles, derived from verbs signifying differentiative behavior. In this column there are 4,541 terms, or about 25 per cent of the entire list.

Column III. This list is the longest of the four, and contains characterial evaluations. Typical examples are insignificant, acceptable, worthy. The paradigm for inclusion reads "Might one judge a man as (worthy) without the man possessing a corresponding biophysical trait which may be symbolized with the same name?" It is obviously impossible to think of worthiness as resident in the structure of personality itself; it is altogether a social judgment. In this respect it differs decidedly from benevolence, tolerance, or patience. A person with three such biophysical traits would no doubt be judged as worthy, but he never could have a neuropsychic disposition of worthiness. Some terms in this column imply no profound moral judgment but rather a social effect upon the emotions or moods of another, e.g., dazzling, irritating. These terms presuppose some traits in a man, but in themselves they are value-estimates and do not symbolize the psychological dispositions in him that cause him to have a dazzling or irritating effect upon others. This column contains 5,226 terms, or 29 per cent of the total list.

Strictly speaking, in the sense of the present volume, Column III is not a list of trait-names at all. It is, however, included for good reasons. In the first place, there are writers who consider personality to be essentially the social influence of an individual, and from this point of view these terms become especially significant; they represent not the reactions of the individual in question, but rather his "social stimulus value." Furthermore, this vocabulary of social impressions and characterial judgment has a certain intrinsic interest for social psychology, sociology, and ethics.

Column IV. There are many terms of possible value in characterizing personality, even though they have no certain place in the first three columns. Since in one way or another they contribute to the total vocabulary of useful terms they are included in this miscellaneous column. More skillful editing might have made possible the assignment of some of these words to the first three columns. Subdivision is also possible. One sub-group might contain terms explanatory of behavior, past participles for the most part (e.g., pampered, crazed, malformed). Another sub-group could be made of physical qualities which are commonly considered to be associated directly or indirectly with psychological traits, e.g., roly-poly, lean, red-headed, hoarse. Still another group could be made of capacities or talents, such as able, gifted, prolific. Then there are many terms of allegorical and doubtful application to human personality, and still others that for various reasons are the despair of the editors. In all, this miscellaneous column contains 3,682 words, or about 21 per cent of the total list.

It must be repeated that this four-fold classification is at best only approximate and to a certain extent arbitrary. Consider first the overlap between Columns I and II. All people are anxious on occasion; the name therefore signifies a state or mood which is a temporarily differentiating feature of behavior, and not a trait. It seems therefore to belong to Column II. But some individuals suffer from an "anxiety neurosis," and for them the term belongs more properly in Column I. They are recurrently and characteristically anxious. Similarly it might be argued that a great many other words in II can on occasion refer to chronic or habitual sets, and that they therefore may symbolize permanent traits. It is necessary in this predicament to introduce the criterion of relative frequency with which the term is ordinarily employed to refer to permanent and to transient qualities of behavior respectively or else to place present participles as a rule in II. Although these decisions are quite arbitrary they seem necessary to preserve the independence of the two columns. It is quite possible to argue that the columns should not be kept independent but should be combined for a more ample estimate of the number of possible trait-names in the English language. Taken together the two columns total 9,045 terms, or approximately 50 per cent of our entire list.

It is often difficult to decide whether a term should be placed in Column I or in Column III. Terms which originated in social judgment, e.g., honest, unselfish, law-abiding, may and often do, become ideals or guiding principles adopted by individuals. In this sense the introception of an ethical ideal into subjective attitude turns a characterial designation into a true trait-name. The plan followed in the classification is to place such terms in Column I if it seems that the social ideal does with fair frequency become a personal ideal, and become thereby a true trait of personality. But it is obvious that certain normative concepts, like fine, crazy, or ideal are too general or too unpsychological ever to correspond precisely to any veridical personal trait.

In spite of our efforts to locate only neutral terms in Column I some of the terms appearing there do seem to imply censorial judgment. In America to say that John is self-assured, inventive, or decisive is to praise him; in some societies he would stand condemned. But in such cases as these it is clear that some definite psychological trait is the object of reference however much the flavor of judgment may cling to the trait-name employed.

The commonest source of confusion between Columns II and III comes in the assignment of present participles. When behavior is described as dazzling or irritating, it is obviously the influence of the activity upon others that is indicated, and such terms, as already explained, fall readily into Column III. Likewise when the intention of the actor is clear, as in teasing or pacifying, their assignment to Column II is necessary. But between these two cases there lie doubtful instances which must be arbitrarily settled, e.g., fascinating, fraternizing, obstructing.

A number of common terms such as broadcasting, fishing, fixing, framing, climbing, and the like do not at first glance appear to belong in the list at all, but in some marginal or slang sense they have become terms applicable to personality. The list contains many such terms which, of course, must be read only in their figurative sense. No words are included in any of the four columns which do not at least in some minor or derived sense distinguish one man's conduct from another's.

Analogies in lower forms of life or in inanimate nature to human qualities have been included (hard, wooden, feline) especially if these are in frequent usage; other unusual but possible analogies, such as rupestrian, scleroid, are included if their application is clearly possible. The more familiar metaphors are generally placed in the first three columns, and the less familiar tend to fall in Column IV. The possibilities of creating metaphors are endless; with poetic license almost any term can be adapted to human nature.

In conclusion, the logic of the four columns can perhaps be made clearer through a reference to the force of certain prefixes. The reader will note that almost all of the words compounded from the prefix self- fall into Column I, e.g., self-abasing, self-critical, self-enjoying. The substantial biophysical emphasis of the term is secured by the use of the reflexive particle. The prefix be- forces many words into Column II (e.g., bedazzled, bemuddled, bewildered). In these cases the force of the prefix is to intensify the present state of mind of the individual, or to indicate some specific and temporary relationship between cause and effect. Certain prefixes such as dull- (dull-witted), first- (first-class) and great- (great-hearted), and the like, obviously connote value-judgments and therefore destine their compounds to Column III. The final column is of such miscellaneous constitution that clear examples are not so easily found. There is, however, a tendency for words commencing with such prefixes as semi- and pseudo- to fall into a column devoted to analogies and metaphors.

9. Phrases and Idioms

Single trait-names by no means exhaust the possible designations of human characteristics. By combining two or more words, none of which in itself is a trait-name, remarkably useful and apt phrases result. If these compounds have become so integral that they are usually written with a hyphen they are included in the present classification. Examples are ne'er-do-well, heavy-hearted, grab-all. But if the phrase is prepositional or otherwise composed of discrete items it is omitted. If space permitted such phrases might be classified, as the single terms are, in four columns. A few illustrations may be given for each.

Column I: to be down at the heel
to be a dog in the manger to be a man of the world

Column II: to be facing the music to be keeping a stiff upper lip to be ill at ease

Column III: to be in bad repute
to be worth one's salt to be setting people by the ears

Column IV: to have halcyon days to work by fits and starts to be a mother's darling

There seems to be no limit to the possible making of phrases. The selection printed in the dictionary is arbitrary and incomplete. Then, too, the distinction between a phrase and an entire sentence characterizing a single trait, is difficult to draw. The effect of many descriptive sentences is as compact and definite as that of a phrase or of a single trait-name. For example, it is often said " He is the sort of person who would be late to his own funeral " or " He lets no flies settle on him " or " He would give away the shirt from his own back." Such sentences have a peculiar forcefulness, and their connotations differ from those of single corresponding trait-names, tardy, alert, generous. Then, as novelists and biographers continually show, a circumlocution is often required to characterize a trait which could not possibly be designated by a single trait-name. For example:

" One of Darwin's characteristic traits was his respect for time. He never for a moment forgot how valuable a thing it was. He economized every minute. He never lost even a few moments which he had on his hands by imagining that it was hardly worth while to begin to work."

" Everyone who knew Henry Higginson was aware of his tendency to judge institutions and problems in terms of personality. To him our world was a world of persons not of theories and abstractions."

" Goethe's belief that there was a truth in everything caused him to listen respectfully to all shades of opinions from all manners of people."

10. Synonyms

No attempt has been made to eliminate or to classify synonyms. The dictionary itself assures us that "A thorough analysis of synonyms will in most cases show that the words actually have marked differences of meaning, and are interchangeable only because their difference does not affect the speaker's intention in a given context." Particularly in the field of human behavior where the number of distinguishable qualities is so great and the number of available trait-names relatively so few, it may be doubted whether there are any such things as exact synonyms.[24]

Precisely the opposite point of view regarding the significance of synonyms is taken by certain statistically-minded psycholo-

[24] " Take the affirmation He was a very stately man. Around the word stately cluster memories and valuations of various and peculiar kinds, memories with which ethical and esthetic judgments are inextricably mixed. In this region of speech words are paramount and there are no real synonyms. Substitute dignified, majestic, or imposing, and the thing said, though not altogether different, is modified to an appreciable extent." A. H. Gardiner, The Theory of Speech and Language. London: Oxford Univ. Press, 1932; p. 53.

gists. Their theory holds that the number of independent variables in human nature is relatively small and determinable, and they accordingly deny that each separate trait-name signifies some distinction so essential that it should not be neglected. T. L. Kelley regards it as "contaminating to clear thinking" to use "two separate words or expressions covering in fact the same basic situation, but sounding different, as though they were in truth different." This procedure he terms the "jangle fallacy" which he illustrates in the following way:

"Achievement and intelligence sound as though they were different; they have different 'jangles,' and thus we treat them as though they were different in truth. There is a modicum of difference between them, and in so far as this only is the issue, it is proper to distinguish between them, just as we may use two nearly related words to draw a fine distinction; thus, 'He is upright but not honorable,' or 'He is fearful but not cowardly.' Literary ingenuity creates for our entertainment the man who is fearful but not a coward. It may be that such men exist in blood and bone, but certainly by no known means can the rank and file be classified separately upon these two traits." [25]

Another mathematical psychologist who regards the number of independent traits as far fewer than the number of trait-names is Thurstone. In an experimental attack upon this problem he prepared a list of 60 common adjectives which he gave to each of 1,300 raters, asking each to think of a person he knew well, and to underline every adjective he might use in a conversational description of that person. Tetrachoric coefficients of correlation indicated the frequency with which each pair of adjectives was applied to the same person. Thurstone then found by his method of multiple factor analysis that five large factors would account for the coefficients, and states, "This fact leads us to surmise that the scientific description of personality may not be quite so hopelessly complex as it is sometimes thought to be." [26]

Thurstone illustrates his findings with the aid of a three-

[25] T. L. Kelley, Interpretations of Educational Measurements, p. 64. Contrary to Professor Kelley's opinion, it is not literary ingenuity that is responsible for the distinctions here mentioned. Novelists take what they find in life. During the Great War it was by no means uncommon to find heroes who were fearful but not cowardly, and the record of the historical Puritan shows that often indeed he was upright but not honorable. Professor Kelley assumes that the criterion of a trait lies in its average occurrence in "the rank and file" rather than in the complex nature of single human beings.

dimensional diagram, discussing the case where only three factors are involved in a set of correlations. Each trait can be represented as a point on the surface of a ball. Two closely correlated traits will be adjacent on the surface. Patient, calm, faithful, and earnest are examples of such related traits. Negatively correlated traits will be on opposite sides of the ball. Two independent traits will be displaced from one another by ninety degrees. The correlation for each pair of traits agrees with the cosines of the central angles, and each trait may be described in terms of its coördinates. This method, however, establishes no natural coördinates and no fixed frame of reference, so that the introduction of new adjectives must be expected to change the composition and even the number of factors. Thurstone, of course, recognizes this difficulty. His solution lies in repeated experiment, in seeking independent factors for each set of trait-names. He says, " These categories should be frankly regarded as temporary and subject to redefinition in successive experiments. Eventually we should be able to work with a rather limited number of mental abilities and trait constellations." [27]

Theoretically it would be possible to apply this ingenious method to a complete list of trait-names, such as that contained in this monograph. One might determine the amount of overlap in meaning between all the terms as they are commonly understood and employed. The investigator might then declare that such and such trait-names are roughly synonymous, and that only one of them needs to be retained if what is desired is a vocabulary of completely independent terms. The trait-names would be grouped, and only a single representative would be saved for each group.

Whether or not one wants a vocabulary of completely independent terms will depend upon his theory of the nature of traits. Those who seek " unique factors " would consider the accomplishment highly significant. Those, on the other hand, who hold the theory of " overlapping traits " would not.

Perkins reports that there are more than 200 words overlapping in meaning with politeness (urbanity, suavity, courtliness, tactfulness, etc.).[28] The theory of independent factors would regard this as extravagant and needless duplication, a mere verbal difference, an example of the "jangle fallacy." The theory of overlapping traits however would consider this a meager enough vocabulary for the possible shadings and forms of polite behavior. The situation is something like that which exists for color-names and color-perceptions. There are perhaps 300 words in English designating color experience. By tetrachoric correlations this list might be greatly reduced, but what an inadequate vocabulary would result for the profusion of distinguishable color sensations, estimated to exceed 2,000,000 in number! From the point of view of the trait-hypothesis it seems equally unreasonable to factor out a handful of independent units in the excessively complex equations of human nature. The dispositions of personality are highly individual, and even though each has its own focus of organization, it quite naturally overlaps with other dispositions. "Synonyms" should not be avoided; if anything they should be multiplied, in order to do more justice to the variety and number of these overlapping dispositions.

[27] Thurstone, op. cit., p. 31.

11. Reliability of the Classification

Three editors, here designated by the initials HO, AL, and GA, collaborated in the selection and classification of the terms. Apart from certain initial attempts that proved false starts, the entire list was re-edited three times. The process required considerable collaboration, and as the criteria for the study gradually emerged and took final form, it was necessary to relocate many of the terms in the list. The final classification as it is here offered represents the judgment of the principal editor, HO. It is of interest to determine the extent to which the other editors, working independently with the same criteria, are able to assign words to the same columns. Nothing like perfect agreement should be expected. Much depends upon the linguistic habits of each individual judge. Even if he has recourse to the dictionary he is often forced to choose arbitrarily between several possible shades of meaning to guide his placement.

[28] M. L. Perkins, op. cit.

An experiment was arranged whereby all three judges independently classified into the four selected columns 300 representative words, drawn from the total list according to a principle of representative distribution. The results of this study may be expressed in percentages of the total number of terms that each pair of judges assigned to identically the same columns.

HO–GA	64%
GA–AL	60%
HO–AL	65%

By chance alone agreement would be expected in 25 per cent of the cases.

Taking only the instances where all three judges agree, we find 141 words or 47 per cent of the list, whereas 6.25 per cent represents the chance expectation.

Examining this average agreement more closely we next determine the peculiarities of each individual judge when his placements are compared with those of the other two judges. The following figures express the percentage of cases in which one judge agrees with the other two.

	Column
Judge	I	II	III	IV
HO	61	44	39	49
AL	63	52	48	28
GA	39	56	54	45

From this table it appears that HO is least successful in his Col. III placements, AL in Col. IV, and GA in Col. I. This result is the direct outcome of the tendency of each judge to have a " favorite " column to which he assigns more terms than do the other judges. The number of terms assigned by each judge to each of the columns is as follows:

	I	II	III	IV	Total
HO	71	86	93	51	300
AL	68	69	75	88	300
GA	110	66	68	56	300

This analysis calls attention to perhaps the principal source of unreliability, namely the tendency of each judge to have a mental set of " leniency " favoring the inclusion of marginal or doubtful terms in one column rather than another.

Two other possible factors accounting for the disagreements among judges were the unfamiliarity of many words, and the existence of the ill-defined fourth column.

Four outside judges selected 130 of the 300 terms as strange and unfamiliar to them. The agreement of the three editors for this group of terms averaged only 45 per cent, as against 47 per cent for the total list, and 48 per cent for the remaining 170 more familiar terms. Apparently established usage and familiarity enhances but slightly the reliability of the placement.

It is to be expected that agreement for terms placed in Column I should exceed that for terms placed in Column IV. The first is defined to include only the more "certain" trait-names whereas the last comprises doubtful and metaphorical words. If we average the complete agreements of the judges for each of the columns we find that this expectation is fulfilled.

Agreements of Three Judges

Column				Whole list	Chance expectation
I	II	III	IV
54%	51%	47%	41%	47%	6.25%

Investigations carried into the province of meaning are notoriously lacking in objectivity, for meaning itself, as the saying goes, is "purely personal." All things considered, the agreement of three editors is gratifying, and seems sufficient to justify our use of the four-part classification. It is freely admitted that the placement of single words is often debatable, but this admission does not affect adversely the general significance of our analysis, for nothing in our argument requires perfect agreement among the judges.

12. Abbreviations

Adjectival and participial forms have been employed wherever possible. If a noun or adverb is used, or if the word is rare, archaic, foreign, or otherwise not standard, the fact is indicated by the following abbreviations. Webster's dictionary is neither meticulous nor consistent in its use of these designations, but since it is the standard chosen it is necessary to follow its guidance in all matters.
